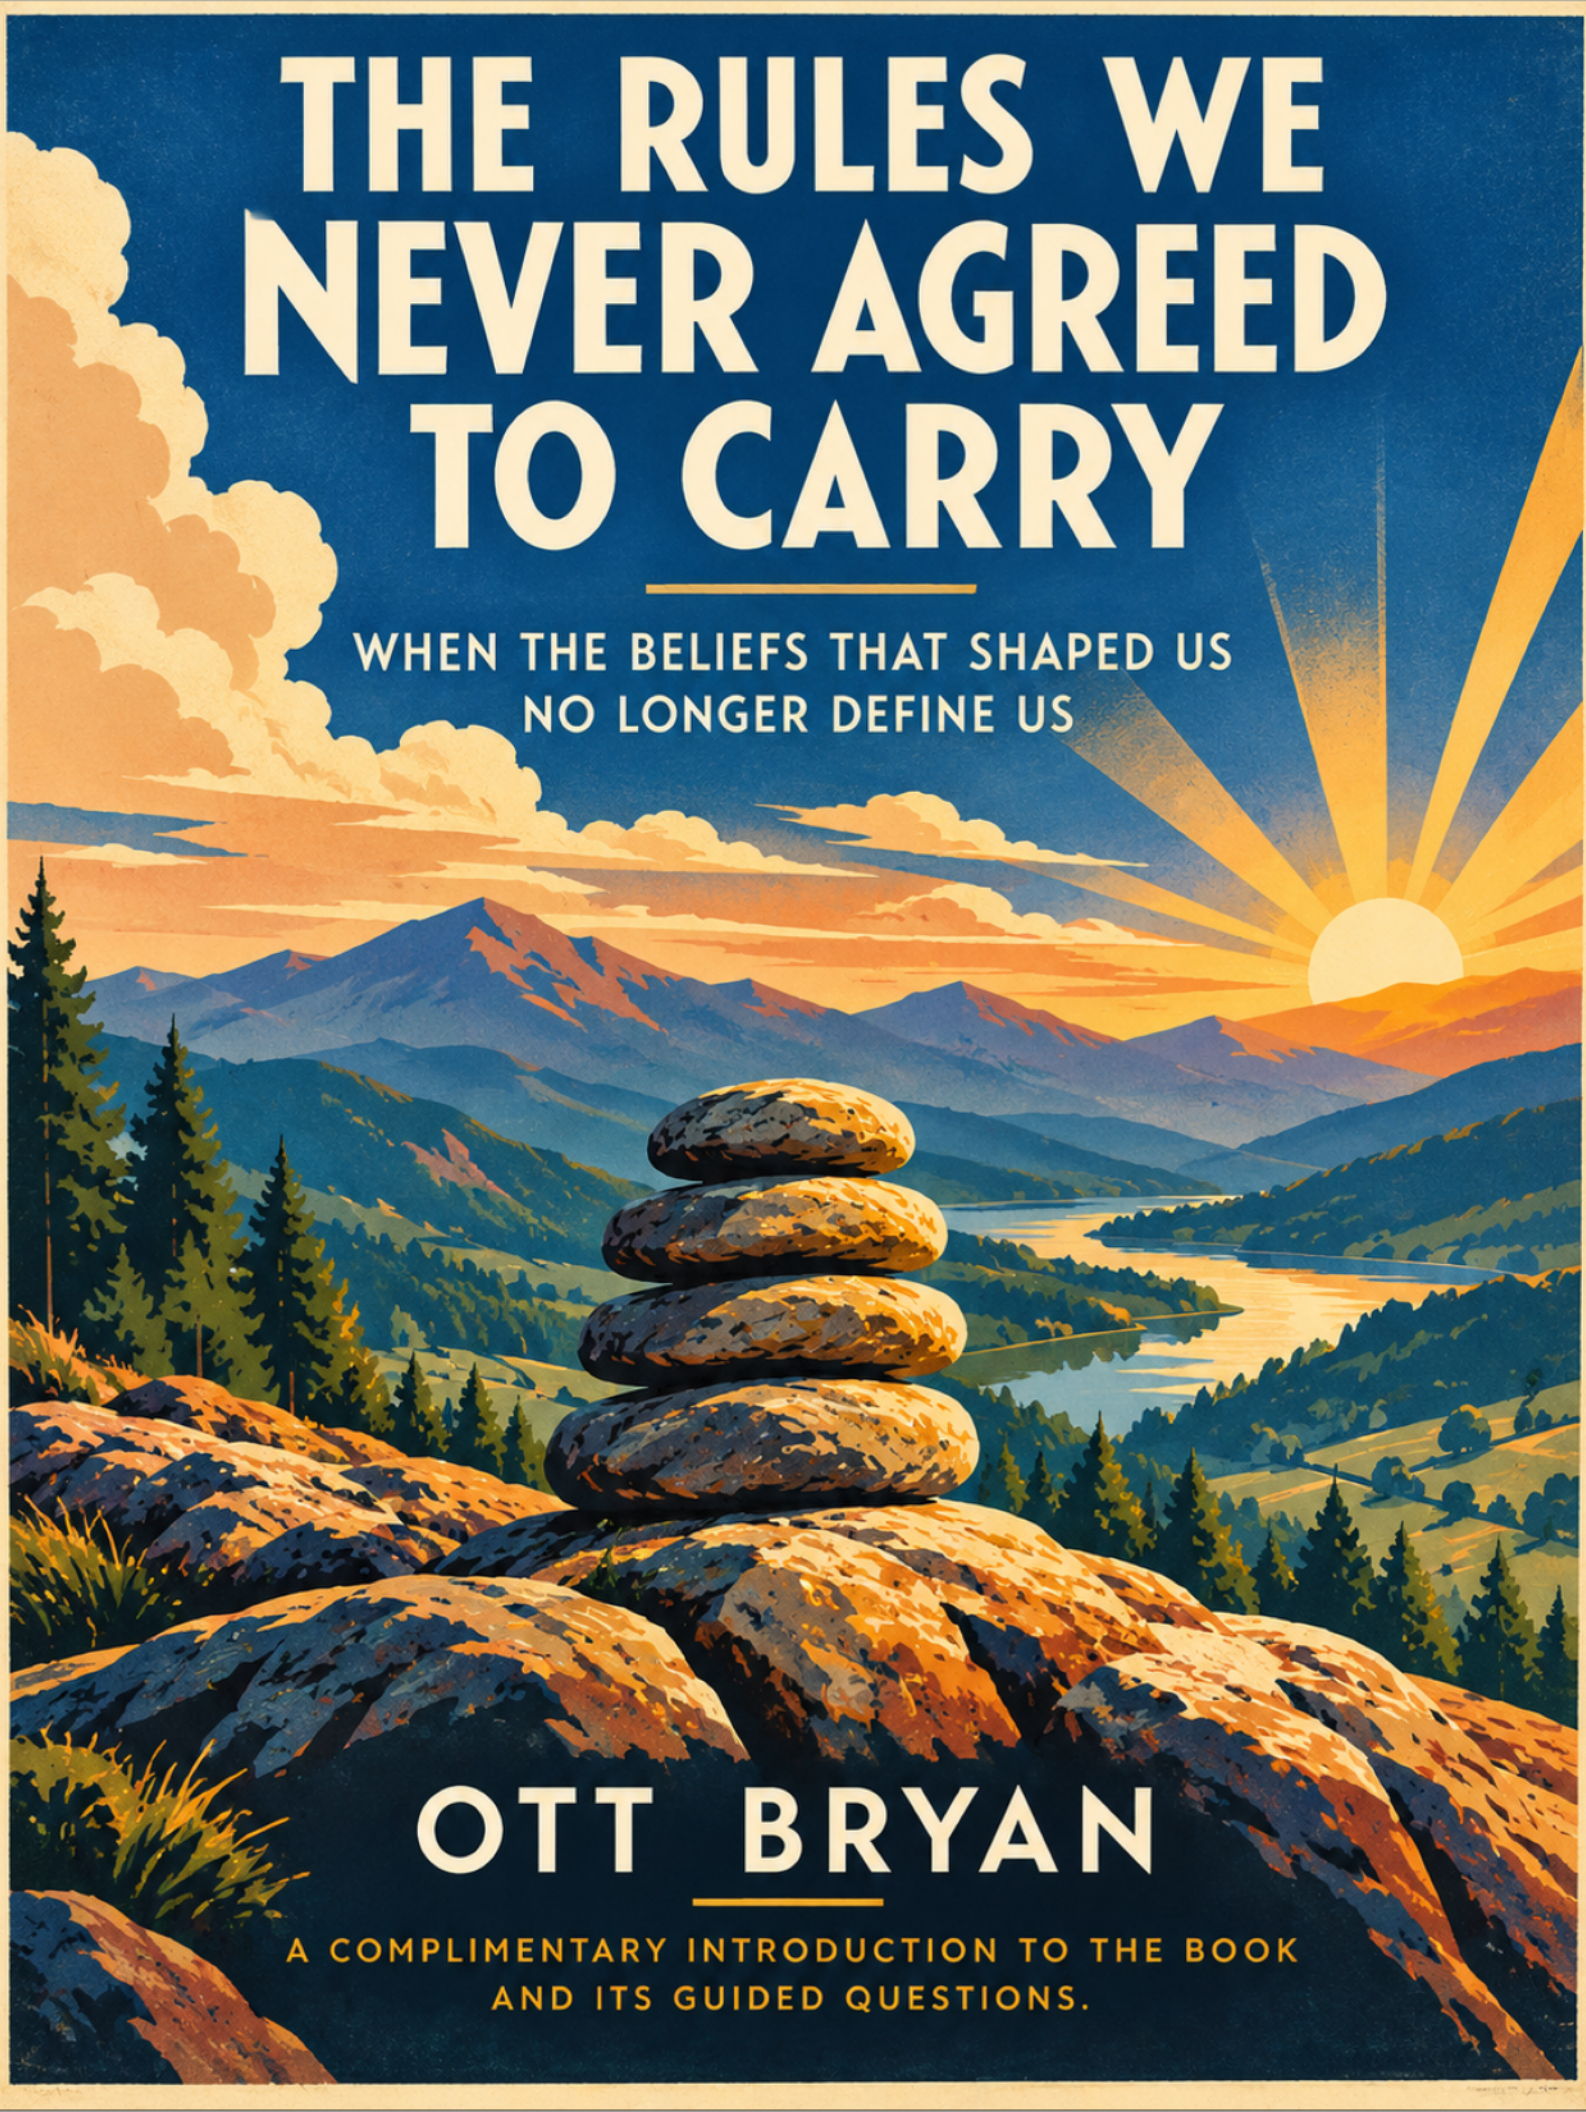
THE RULES WE NEVER AGREED TO CARRY

WHEN THE BELIEFS THAT SHAPED US NO LONGER DEFINE US



OTT BRYAN

A COMPLIMENTARY INTRODUCTION TO THE BOOK AND ITS GUIDED QUESTIONS.

THE RULES WE NEVER AGREED TO CARRY

An Invitation to Examine What We Believe

A complimentary introduction to the book and its guided questions.

The Life We Didn't Know We Were Choosing

Most of us have a reasonably convincing explanation of who we are. We know what we like and what we dislike. We know the things we are good at, the circumstances that make us uncomfortable, and the situations we would prefer to avoid. We have explanations for our successes and disappointments. We have stories about our families, our relationships, and the decisions that brought us to where we are. And somewhere within those stories, we have developed an understanding of ourselves.

But how much of that understanding have we consciously examined? How many of the things we believe about ourselves began as conclusions drawn from experiences we no longer remember clearly? How many of our expectations were shaped by people whose influence remains with us, even though the circumstances of our lives have changed? How many possibilities have we dismissed, not because we examined them and decided against them, but because we never imagined they belonged to us?

These are not questions that require us to distrust everything we have learned. Many of our beliefs have served us well. They have helped us make decisions, maintain relationships, accept responsibilities, and navigate uncertainty. Some represent convictions we have considered carefully and would willingly choose again. Others may have been accepted so gradually that we no longer recognize them as beliefs at all. We experience them as facts. This is simply who I am. I've never been good at that. People like me don't do things like that. I couldn't possibly. And because these statements have become familiar, we may never think to ask whether they remain true.

This book begins with that possibility. Not that everything we believe is wrong. But that some of what we believe may never have been consciously chosen.

The Things We Carry

Imagine arriving in the world without any particular understanding of who you are supposed to become. You begin with experience. You observe the people around you. You discover which behaviors bring approval, which invite disapproval, and which seem to make life easier or more difficult. You learn what is expected.

Some lessons are spoken directly. Others arrive through example, repetition, affection, disappointment, or silence. Over time, you begin carrying these understandings with you. Some are useful. Some are generous. Some help you recognize what matters and how you wish to live. Others become obligations whose origins you can no longer identify.

You may carry an expectation because someone you loved believed it was important. You may preserve a rule because it once protected you. You may continue following an instruction long after the person who gave it has disappeared from your daily life. And because you have carried these things for so long, they begin to feel inseparable from who you are. You might never have stopped to consider which belong to you.

From the book: The Things We Carry

The book opens with a story about a man who has carried the same burden for so long that he has learned to arrange his movements around its discomfort. He adjusts his shoulder, avoids certain paths, and accepts the sharp edges as part of walking.

Then he encounters the possibility of carrying something different.

What unsettles him is how naturally he has accepted the old burden as his own. He knows its weight and every place where it hurts. Yet he cannot remember ever choosing it.

The Noticing

He had believed the old one was his. Not that it was comfortable. Not that it was good. Only that it was his. He had never understood that those were different things.

Without the constant irritation of the sharp edges, the path became easier to walk. He began going farther without realizing it. Sometimes he would look up and discover that he had traveled much farther than he intended.

And because he was no longer spending so much attention managing what hurt, he began noticing where he was. There were trees he had walked past before without seeing. There were changes in the light. There were places where the path narrowed beside water and others where it climbed high enough that the land opened beneath him. He discovered that he could climb more easily now. And from the higher places, he could see farther. For a while, this delighted him. He wanted to know how far the path went. So he kept walking.

Until one afternoon, from one of those new vistas, he looked back. Far below him, he could see the road he had traveled. And on it were other people. Some were moving quickly. Some slowly. Some had become so accustomed to compensating for what they carried that their bodies had bent around it. He recognized the movement. The small adjustment of the shoulder. The hand reaching behind to move the sharp place. The pause until the discomfort subsided. Then walking again. He stood watching them for a long time.

The Climb Back Down

And then he turned around. People noticed. They watched him descend the path he had worked so hard to climb. Eventually, someone stopped him. “Where are you going?” he asked. He pointed back down the mountain. “To the place where the names are stitched inside." The stranger looked puzzled. "Why?" he inquired. He looked back toward the summit and then down toward the people still climbing.

"Because I think some of them have walked past their names," he replied. And he continued down. He did not intend to tell anyone which one to choose. He had made that mistake before—believing that because something had become true for him, it must therefore be true for someone else. No. He would only show them the place. He would say, "There are names stitched inside these." And perhaps: "You might want to see if one of them is yours."

Some would laugh. Some would tell him that what they carried had belonged to their father, and his father before him. Some would explain that carrying difficult things built character. Some would become angry. Some would insist there was nothing hurting them at all, even as they shifted the weight on their shoulder. He would let them continue. Because another thing he had learned on the mountain was that "you cannot make someone notice." Attention cannot be forced.

The Place with the Names

But every now and then someone would stop. They would look. And there it would be. Their name. He would watch the confusion cross their face. Then recognition. Then fear. Because putting down something you have carried your entire life can feel remarkably like losing part of yourself. So he would not tell them to put it down. He would sit beside them. Sometimes for a minute. Sometimes much longer. Until one of them finally asked: "What happened when you changed yours?" And he would tell them the truth. "Nothing." They would look disappointed. Then he would smile. "And then everything."

Years later, people would tell stories about the man who walked back down the mountain. Some said he taught people how to live. That wasn't true. Some said he knew which things people were supposed to carry. That wasn't true either. Some said he had discovered the right path. He would have laughed at that. All he had discovered was that something he had been carrying did not belong to him.

There had been other things afterward. Stories about worth. Stories about love. Stories about success and failure. Stories about what a good man should want. Stories about what age permitted. Stories about what could no longer happen. Stories about who he had been and therefore who he was required to remain. One by one, he began examining the things he had been carrying. Some things he kept. That surprised him too.

When a Belief Becomes a Rule

There is a difference between a principle we value and a rule we feel compelled to obey. Consider generosity. We might believe that generosity is a worthwhile quality. We may take genuine pleasure in helping others, sharing what we have, or making another person's circumstances a little easier. That belief may reflect something we consciously value.

But somewhere along the way, another expectation may have become attached to it. If I am able to help, I must help. If someone needs something, I should provide it. If I put my own needs first, I am being selfish. Generosity has not disappeared. But it may now be accompanied by an obligation that we have never consciously examined.

The same can happen with responsibility, loyalty, perseverance, independence, and many other qualities we admire. Responsibility can become the belief that everything depends upon us. Loyalty can become the conviction that changing our minds would betray someone we love. Perseverance can become an inability to stop pursuing something that no longer matters to us. Independence can become discomfort with accepting help.

None of these possibilities means that the original quality was mistaken. It means that the quality and the obligation attached to it may deserve separate consideration. We can value generosity without deciding that every request must be met. We can remain loyal to someone without agreeing with everything they believe. We can preserve responsibility without assuming responsibility for everything.

The examination does not require us to abandon the qualities we value. It invites us to consider whether we have attached rules to them that we would not consciously choose today.

The Authority of Familiarity

Some beliefs become convincing simply because we have lived with them for a long time. We repeat a description of ourselves. We remember experiences that seem to support it. We notice circumstances that confirm what we already expect. Eventually, the belief no longer feels like an interpretation. It feels like knowledge.

Someone who has long believed they are uncomfortable meeting new people may approach unfamiliar social situations with that expectation already in place. They may become more attentive to moments of awkwardness than to moments of ease. They may decline invitations or leave conversations early. Over time, their experiences may appear to confirm the belief. Yet the belief has also influenced which experiences they allowed themselves to have.

This does not prove that their discomfort is imaginary. It does not mean that changing their thinking would remove every difficulty. It raises a different question. How much of what they know about themselves has been learned through experience, and how much has been reinforced by the expectations they brought to that experience?

Sometimes a new experience provides an unexpected opportunity to reconsider an old conclusion. A person we feared would reject us welcomes us without hesitation. An opportunity we believed was beyond our abilities turns out to be something we can learn. A responsibility we assumed no one else could manage continues perfectly well when we step away.

These moments do not necessarily overturn an entire belief. But they may create a little room around it. And sometimes that is enough to begin asking a question we have never asked before. From the book: When Familiarity Becomes Truth.

03 | WHEN FAMILIARITY BECOMES TRUTH

There are things we believe so completely that we no longer experience them as beliefs. We experience them as facts. We know that we are cautious, independent, generous, impatient, or uncomfortable with attention. We know which situations will make us anxious, which people we can trust, and which opportunities are unlikely to work out. We know what we are capable of doing and, perhaps more importantly, what we believe lies beyond our abilities.

We may have good reasons for these conclusions. Some are supported by years of experience. Others reflect careful observation and sound judgment. But not every conviction has been examined with the same care. Some have simply been repeated. A thought occurs often enough that it begins to feel familiar. Familiarity makes it easier to accept. We interpret new experiences through what we already believe, and those interpretations reinforce the original conclusion.

Eventually, the belief becomes so thoroughly integrated into our understanding of the world that questioning it seems unnecessary. We no longer ask whether it is true. We begin with the assumption that it is. And because the assumption feels natural, we may never notice how much of our experience is being organized around it.

The comfort of what we already know

Human beings depend upon familiarity. Without it, ordinary life would require an exhausting amount of conscious consideration. We would have to reconsider every decision, evaluate every interaction, and examine every assumption before taking action. Instead, we learn. We recognize patterns. We develop expectations. We use previous experiences to anticipate what may happen next. We remember which approaches have worked, which situations require caution, and which decisions are unlikely to produce desirable results.

This ability is essential. Experience allows us to navigate familiar circumstances efficiently, freeing our attention for situations that genuinely require new consideration. But the same efficiency that makes familiarity useful can also make it difficult to recognize when an established conclusion deserves another look.

Imagine someone who has long believed that they are uncomfortable speaking in front of groups. They avoid opportunities to speak, and the avoidance leaves them with little new evidence about how they might respond today. A conclusion drawn from an earlier experience remains untested, not necessarily because it is correct, but because it has been with them for so long.

A belief can become familiar through repetition without becoming more accurate.

When repetition begins to resemble evidence

We often assume that strongly held beliefs must rest upon substantial evidence. But the strength of a belief and the quality of the evidence supporting it are not the same thing.

Consider someone who repeatedly tells themselves that they are not particularly creative. Perhaps they struggled with drawing as a child. Perhaps they were surrounded by people whose artistic abilities seemed far greater than their own. Perhaps someone once described them as practical rather than imaginative. The person accepted the description. Over time, they repeated it in different circumstances. When invited to participate in something artistic, they declined because they were not creative. When asked to suggest an original approach, they deferred to someone they considered more imaginative. When they encountered something unfamiliar, they assumed that others would be better equipped to develop a solution. Each repetition strengthened the familiarity of the conclusion. But repetition did not necessarily produce additional evidence.

The person may have spent years solving complex problems, adapting to changing circumstances, inventing practical solutions, or finding original ways to help others. They simply did not recognize those activities as expressions of creativity. Their definition of creativity remained attached to the original comparison. And the conclusion continued to feel true because they had repeated it so often.

This is one of the reasons our language deserves attention. Statements such as I have never been good at that, I am not the sort of person who does those things, or That has always been difficult for me can appear to describe established facts. Yet they may also preserve interpretations that have not been reconsidered for years. The words themselves are not necessarily the problem. Sometimes they are entirely accurate. The question is whether we are describing something we have recently examined or repeating something we have long assumed.

There is a meaningful difference between saying that we have struggled with something in the past and declaring that we are incapable of doing it. One describes experience. The other may turn experience into a prediction. And predictions, when treated as certainties, can begin influencing the very circumstances that might otherwise challenge them. Editorial selection: Choose a passage that illustrates how repetition, attention, memory, or expectation reinforces a belief. Prefer a passage with a concrete example, and allow it to finish on a question or observation rather than a chapter summary.

An Invitation to Examine

The pages that follow offer seven questions drawn from the guided examination accompanying The Rules We Never Agreed to Carry. They are not a test. There are no preferred answers, and no score to calculate. A yes does not mean that a belief is helpful. A no does not mean that it is limiting. Uncertainty is not a failure to understand. Each answer is simply a place from which to begin.

You may discover that something you believe deserves to remain exactly as it is. You may find that a conviction needs greater room for exceptions. You may recognize an expectation that belonged to an earlier period of your life. Or you may find that you are not yet ready to decide. There is no requirement to reach a conclusion.

Sample Questions for Examination

1 | The Rules We Carry

Do I believe that most of the rules guiding my life are ones I have consciously chosen?

YES / NO / UNSURE

Explore further: Which expectations have I deliberately accepted, and which have simply become part of how I live?

2 | The Voices We Carry

Do I ever feel disloyal when I disagree with a belief passed down by someone I love?

YES / NO / UNSURE

Explore further: What does loyalty mean to me, and how have I learned to express it?

3 | The Stories We Tell

Do I describe myself using qualities or limitations that have remained unchanged for many years?

YES / NO / UNSURE

Explore further: Which descriptions do I use most often, and how accurately do they represent the person I am today?

4 | The Choices We Make

Have I ever dismissed a possibility before seriously considering whether I wanted it?

YES / NO / UNSURE

Explore further: What made the possibility seem unsuitable, unrealistic, or unavailable to me?

What We May Discover

There is a temptation, when we begin examining our beliefs, to assume that the purpose must be to change them. But examination and change are not the same thing. We may discover that something we inherited is deeply meaningful to us. We may understand its origins more clearly and find that we would choose it again without hesitation.

We may recognize that a belief once protected us, helped us belong, or allowed us to navigate circumstances we did not know how to manage differently. We can appreciate that purpose without insisting that the belief remain unchanged forever. And we may discover that something we have treated as an unavoidable fact about ourselves was, in truth, a conclusion formed under particular circumstances. A conclusion that deserves another look.

There is no need to condemn the person who first reached it. That person was working with the understanding, experience, and possibilities available at the time. Nor do we need to reject the people who influenced us. We can be grateful for what we were given while allowing ourselves to decide what we wish to continue carrying.

The purpose is not to exchange one collection of unquestioned rules for another. It is to become more conscious of the beliefs through which we understand ourselves and participate in life. And perhaps to recognize that the life we have been living is not necessarily the only life available to us.

The Invitation Continues

The Rules We Never Agreed to Carry explores thirteen chapters across four parts.

Part One | The Beliefs We Inherit

How experience becomes interpretation, how the voices of others influence what we believe, and why familiarity can begin to feel like truth.

Part Two | The Person We Believe Ourselves to Be

How beliefs become part of our identity, influence the choices we recognize as available, and continue shaping our behavior even after we begin questioning them.

Part Three | The Beliefs We Cannot Easily See

How less visible assumptions influence our reactions, our willingness to receive, and the conditions we place upon our own participation in life.

Part Four | The Freedom to Choose Again

How we can live with greater awareness, learn through experience, and consciously consider what deserves to remain part of our lives.

The complete book is accompanied by a collection of 91 paired questions for examination, seven for each chapter, offering readers a way to explore its ideas in relation to their own experiences. You may choose to read the book quietly and privately. You may choose to work through the questions with someone you trust. Or you may find that a single passage stays with you, becoming meaningful only when some later experience gives you reason to remember it.

There is no prescribed way to undertake the examination. And there is no particular person you are expected to become. The invitation is simply to pay attention. To notice what you believe. To consider where those beliefs came from. And to decide, where a decision is yours to make, what you consciously wish to carry forward. Because the beliefs that shaped us need not always define us.

Continue Reading

THE RULES WE NEVER AGREED TO CARRY

When the Beliefs That Shaped Us No Longer Define Us

The complete book and its companion guided questions.

© 2026 JourneyM8 Ltd. All rights reserved.